Arrest and Detention

US State Department Says:

If (a police) investigation concludes that the evidence is sufficient to warrant arrest, the case is passed to the Procuratorate. The suspect will likely be detained throughout the pre-trial investigation.

If the Procuratorate refers the case to the Court—the Intermediate People’s Court, in the case of foreigners—the Court will again review the case. If the Court decides to proceed to trial, conviction is virtually certain. The defendant’s sentence can range from a fine to life imprisonment to the death penalty.

During post-conviction consular visits, consular officers are sometimes allowed to deliver parcels containing food, clothing, medication, and reading material.
